Humanism and Christianity

By Bishop Francis J. McConnell

"Without a doubt the ablest Protestant clergyman of his age in America" is the way Dr. Cadman characterizes Bishop McConnell. Any new book of his can safely be considered "important." This volume, which considers humanism, is especially valuable from the fact that that point of view in religion is again coming to the fore. But his book—lectures delivered at the Newton Theological Institution—considers much else: Christian Intolerance, Society and the Higher Individualism, Mysticism, Jesus and Vested Interests, Human Nature and Divine, The Church and the World, Instrumentalism. Here is "the task immediately before the church," according to Bishop McConnell: "a skeptical scrutiny of all ecclesiastical methods, and intolerance toward those that fall short. The very sacredness of the aim of religious endeavor impels us to be severe toward tools, methods, organizations." ($1.75)

The Drift of the Day

By Burris Jenkins

The absence of long, puzzling words and agonizing theological argument will perhaps make this book disappointing for the reader who feels that he must wrinkle his brow in order to get satisfaction out of a book. But the author has lived many years, and has gone a long way—from Yale Divinity school and two or three college presidencies, through a long service as minister of a great city church, through the editorship of a city newspaper—as an avocation only—to a present-day realization that what the masses of people are looking for is an interpretation of the themes of religion that is understandable and "everydayish" as sunshine and rain and forests and mountains. He is a lover of beauty rather than of theological tomes. ($2)

WHITHER MANKIND

W. E. Garrison says in The Christian Century:

"I can give no better advice to one who wants to chart the recent course of civilization and forecast its future than to read this book."

The book is edited by Dr. Charles A. Beard, famous co-author of "The Rise of American Civilization." He contributes a brilliant chapter introducing the whole discussion, and closes with a satisfying resumé. This is the first work by a group of world authorities which successfully attempts to assess the values of our modern civilization.

Over 70,000 copies already distributed by the Book-of-the-Month Club, which chose the work as its November Book. (Only $3.)
